

Abstract

The study of the appearance of the daytime sky and light scattering in the atmosphere generally requires complex numerical methods to model accurately. However, in cases where the atmosphere is optically thin, simple models can produce computationally inexpensive yet useful results. We present here a single-scatter model using a method of direct integration and present results which demonstrate the broadest features of the daytime sky.